ABSTRACT

This is survey study carried out to investigate the factors that predisposes the use of drugs among students in Olabisi Onabanjo University. The research work started with the background of this research topic. The research problem was that there are some factors that influence the use of drugs, especially misuse of drugs (peer influence, drug availability, and family conflict). The objectives of the study were drawn from the statement of the research problem and were to ascertain whether peer influence, drug availability, and family conflict predisposes drug intake. The researcher laid emphasis on these variables in literature review. There was a brief introduction to the chapter and what it intends to deliver, including the objectives of analyzing the factors that predisposes the use of drugs among students. Literature of other authors was reviewed as they relate to the research topic then the theories that are surrounding this research topic were brought to light in the conceptual framework, theoretical framework, empirical framework and the gap in the literature reviewed. A descriptive research design was used. Also, questionnaire methods were mainly used to collect data from the sampled students (A case study of university students in Olabisi Onabanjo University, Ago-Iwoye, Ogun State). The data was analyzed using descriptive and inferential statistics. The findings of this study clearly show that peer influence and family conflict predisposes drug intake among students, while drug availability does not predispose drug intake among students in O.O.U. Based on the findings, it was recommended that Students should relate with decent cliques of friends rather than the ones who abuses drugs at their own will. Families should make sure they settle their disputes as soon as they disagree over issues.
